

General questions

1. What problems can you identify in this story? Are solutions presented?
2. In what way might this story be relevant in your community?

Further exploration

1. MSF works in dangerous conflict zones, and their staff are often put at risk. Where should the line be drawn between keeping staff safe and providing desperately needed medical care?
2. In some regions, MSF has been able to keep operating by agreeing not to criticize government policies it acknowledged were repressive. Is silence the same as complicity in the repressive government policies? Why or why not?
3. If yes, is it more important to be able to deliver aid than to publicly disagree with a government?
