1. Many countries like Uganda suffer from a “brain drain.” Do you think people have an obligation to invest in their own community even if it could hurt their personal welfare?
2. Sub-Saharan Africa has 24 percent of the world’s global burden of disease, and only 3 percent of the world health care work force. What impact could that disparity have on a society?
3. One problem nurses in Uganda face is the public perception of their profession. How can that culture be altered? Nurses in the United States have historically complained of similar issues. How have they “moved the needle” to gain more respect for their profession if in fact you think they have?
